

Mike Johnston

Advisor

Michael Johnston spent his career in finance, but in his retirement he is spending much of his time on pro bono activities. After graduating from college in engineering physics he attended Harvard Business School. He spent 2 years in the Army in Germany, and entered the world of finance on his return. He headed investment research at Mitchell Hutchins, and became president of BlythEastmen PaineWebber the firm's investment banking effort. He joined the Capital Group asset management firm before retiring. His pro bono activities involve service in the university sector with the NewSchool in NYC, Claremont Graduate University, Union Theological Seminary, several foundations and private corporate boards. He also served in several Presidential campaigns as advisors to the candidates.
